Concerning Owls. SOME OF THE CURIOUS THINGS ASTRONOMER PROCTOR HAS OBSERVED.

"There is a ridiculous notion among country folk in England and America," writes Mr. Proctor, "respecting the behavior of the barn-owl, when any one, fixing his eyes on the bird, walks round and round him. They imagine that the owl keeps his eyes constantly fixed on the person thus constantly fixed on the person thus travelling round, and that the owl's head turning round continually in one direction, the bird eventually dies miserably—like the unfortunate lady in the Ingoldsby legend, of whose head it is related that her hashand 'twisted it on till he twisted it off.'" legend, of whose bead it is related that her hasband 'twisted it on till he twisted it off.'"

An American naturalist recently put the matter to the test, not, of course, with any idea that the owl either twists his head on or would twist it off in the way imagined by country people. At first, however, it really looked as though there were something in the common story. The head of the owl he experimented on went round apparently a half turn, a whole turn, two whole turns, three, four, until certainly it might have been expected that in the ordinary course of things it was bound to come off. Looking more closely, however, he perceived that so soon as the owl had turned his head balf-way round, so as to be looking backwards, it very quickly carried its head back a full turn, so as to be again looking backward, only now in such sort ithat as its interviewer continued his movement the owl's bend following his motion came right after said observer had completed his first circuit, and was only half a turn round when he had completed a circuit and his first circuit, and was only half a turn round when he had completed a circuit and a half. Then the process was repeated; and clearly it might have gone on indefinitely without any particular barm to the owl. The naturalist repeated the experiment several times, always with the same

I wonder whether Darwin could show I wonder whether Darwin could show that this peculiar habit of the owl family had its own origin in a peculiarity of ancestral owls, which, being advantageous to them, has developed through the process of natural selection into the fully-developed habit of bead-turning, or rather of the unintermitting stare which the owl affects. This case reminds me of the singular behavior of a pretty little owl whose acquaintance I made a year or two ago at Brighton, Erg. This little fellow (he was very young as well as little) was manifestly subject to that this peculiar habit of the owl family had its own origin in a peculiarity of an-cestral owls, which, being advantageous to as well as little) was manifestly subject to superstitious lears. Whether some nursing owl, to whose care be had been intrusted in his babyhood, had told him ghost stories, or whether he inherited the superstitious beliefs of ancestral owls, this depouent sayeth not, not knowing. But whatever the cause, the effect was manifest. When he could see the greater part of any visitor's person he was comparatively happy, unless the visitor were an unusual and to bim mysterious garb. But visitors on so small a scale as not to show more than their head. or head and shoulders above the floor of his cage terrified him exceedingly. A small daughter of mine, for instance, aged ten at that time, seemed to excite peculiar terrors. It must be explained that she is particularly gentle and kind to all animals, great and small; and all animals, save this in-But her height is, or was, just that which is most thoroughly objectionable to him. So soon as he recognized the mysterious phe-nomenon of a head moving along near the floor of his abode (for this doubtless is the marvels at) he began to execute a wild dance at the back of his care, with his back true. marvels at) he began to execute a wild dence at the back of his cage, with his back turned toward her, as though he reality could not hear to look at anything so very terrible. Every now and then he would turn sharply round to see if the were still there, and then turn back again and renew his wild saltatorial movements. Here was manifestly a case of superstitious terror—that is, terror excited by the mysterious and inexplicable—a terror which found partial relief in exercises resembling those by which a certain seet work.

The owl in their religious excitement. The owl in the head-turning experiment may not, perhaps, be really fascinated by the intent gaze of the person who, cir-culting around it, keeps its head on the turn. But in the same aviary where the owl was kept which behaved so strangely when a head appeared before his eyes with-out the usual accompaniment of a body, a singular illustration of the influence of hirds of previous smaller birds, was more birds of prey on smaller birds was more than once afforded. Among the birds there is an eagle which, though no longeryoung, of prey—an eagle captured in its youth, and so little like a wild eagle that it can be loosed from its cage without attempting or, indeed, being able to escape. Jurymen Must Be Sober. A NEW LAW WHICH RENDERS GETTING DRUNKS

The Court—Special-Judge J. M. Greer presiding—requested the Attorney-General to state the ground of his objections.

"I object," replied that official, "because he has been drunk within the past three months."

The utterance caused a general craning of necks in the direction of the speaker. It was something new to not only the Court, but evidently Judge Horrigan, too, who is defending Thomas.

Editors Dispatch: You are mistaken in your suggestion as to my "turning the board sround." I do not do it, and can't see any advantage derived from doing so. I do not pick the men up and put them in order, but work it out in accordance with the rules of the game as I understand them, and do not disturb the two upper rows ending with eight. If you look in the World of April I (semi-weekly edition), will find it can also be gotten by other parties.

Amicus.

The court shall inquire as to the existence of either or of all said causes of challenge, by the ost of the party or by such other testimony as the court in its discretion may desire to hear on behalf of either party."

The reading of this new and hitherto buried unknown law was followed by ill-suppressed demonstrations of laughter, amid which one or two persons present wanted to know whether the act could also be applied to members of the courts, to the bar, etc. But there could be no question of the statute's existence. There it was on the bread official page, and the embryo jurior having admitted that he had been overcome within the period referred to by an emissary of the devil, in the shape of "tangle-foot," he was ordered to stand aside.
